SIZWE SAMA

SIZWE SAMA 'YOU HANDED ME THE SCISSORS'

In Sizwe Sama's captivating series titled 'You Handed Me The Scissors', the artist explores the importance of cutting ties with negative individuals. Drawing from personal experiences, Sama delves into the dynamics of one-sided relationships. In today's social media-driven world, where narcissism often prevails, we are presented with carefully curated versions of people's lives. We witness the happy moments and snapshots of joy and excitement but remain unaware of the struggles and challenges they face behind the scenes. Our society has lost sight of what true happiness means. As depression rates soar, our obsession with material possessions grows. Massive corporations invest billions of dollars in advertising campaigns, convincing us that their products hold the key to our happiness.

Sama goes deeper into the complexities of the human condition, questioning how we can cultivate self-awareness instead of being self-absorbed. Some of the titles in the series, such as 'Repent Your Sins', 'Holier Than Thou', and 'The Confession', playfully explore the correlation between religion and spirituality, regardless of one's faith. Spirituality can be found in various places, whether it be in a church, temple, mosque, or atop a mountain. Sama emphasises the importance of helping oneself before being able to help others.

All the figures in this series are women, paying homage to Sama's mother, a pivotal figure in his life. Raised in a single-parent household after his father walked out at an early age, his mother has always provided him with unconditional love. These foundations have shaped his values and identity. However, navigating love and relationships can be challenging. Titles such as 'Selfish', 'Cat Got Your Tongue', 'Checkmate', and 'Two-Faced' highlight the complexities of dealing with narcissism and its prevalence in society. Narcissistic relationships are characterised by excessive self-importance, a constant need for admiration, and a lack of empathy towards others. Sama questions how, in an age of inflated self-importance, healthy relationships should be based on mutual respect, empathy, and support.

Sama incorporates a rich diversity of African fabrics in his artwork, each with its unique history dating back centuries. African fabrics such as Kitenge, Shweshwe and Ndebele are featured. Kitenge, widely worn in East Africa, is a colourful floral fabric made from cotton, known for its bold patterns. Shweshwe fabric, a printed cotton fabric with a stiff texture, is culturally significant in South Africa and often worn during special occasions and celebrations.

Ndebele fabric holds deep symbolism within the culture, characterised by vibrant colours, bold patterns, and geometric designs that represent the unique visual language of the Ndebele people in South Africa. Tweed fabric, adopted and integrated into African fashion, bridges European influences with African cultural expressions, contributing to the vibrant fashion landscape of the continent.

Sama's artwork captures the passion of both love and loss, as depicted in the vibrant and bold works of his series, 'You Handed Me The Scissors'. Through his skilful use of colour, texture, and composition, Sama conveys the intensity of emotions experienced in relationships. Whether it's the fiery reds and oranges symbolising desire and passion or the deep blues and purples representing sadness and heartbreak, each work evokes a powerful response from the viewer.

The figures in Sama's artwork exude a sense of vulnerability and strength simultaneously, reflecting the complexities of love and the resilience required to navigate through the challenges of relationships. The use of expressive gestures and facial expressions further enhances the emotional impact of the artwork, allowing viewers to connect on a deeper level.

In his exploration of loss, Sama's art invites contemplation and reflection. The juxtaposition of fabric, along with the incorporation of symbolic elements such as scissors, represents the act of letting go and severing ties with negativity. This visual metaphor resonates with viewers, reminding them of the importance of self-preservation and the need to prioritise their own well-being.

Overall, Sama's series 'You Handed Me The Scissors' not only captivates the eye but also touches the heart. It serves as a poignant reminder of the passionate highs and heart-breaking lows experienced in relationships, urging us to reflect on our own experiences and the significance of self-care in fostering healthy connections.

BIOGRAPHY

Sizwe Sama (b.1986) is a self-taught visual artist hailing from Kwa-Zulu Natal. His journey into the world of art began with visits to the Tatham Art Gallery and exploring art books at his local library in Pietermaritzburg. His work serves as a tribute to the LGBTQI+ community, advocating for freedom and self-expression, while also allowing him to reflect and express his own queer identity. While his art celebrates queer personhood, it is also deeply rooted in his personal experiences and cherished memories.

Drawing inspiration from his mother, a seamstress who single-handedly raised him and his brother, Sama learned the art of hand sewing. His mother's unique approach to mending their clothes left an indelible mark on his creative journey. She has played a pivotal role in providing him with a foundation of love that has shaped his values and identity.

Sama's artwork embraces the richness of African fabrics, each with its centuries-old history. His creations feature a diverse range of African fabrics, including Kitenge, Shweshwe, Ndebele, and Tweed. Kitenge, renowned for its vibrant floral patterns, is widely worn in East Africa. Shweshwe, a printed cotton fabric with a distinctive texture, holds cultural significance in South Africa and is often worn on special occasions. Ndebele fabric, characterised by its bold colours, striking patterns, and geometric designs, embodies the unique visual language of the Ndebele people in South Africa. Tweed fabric, blending European influences with African cultural expressions, contributes to the dynamic fashion landscape of the continent.

In his current series, Sama explores the perils of narcissism in relationships, families, and friendships. Through his artwork, he sheds light on the potential dangers and negative impacts that toxic individuals can have on our lives. By delving into this theme, he aims to raise awareness and provoke contemplation about the importance of recognising and safeguarding oneself against toxic relationships to maintain overall well-being.
